

The Ghost

Robert Harris

1 Michael McAra was last seen alive on 12th January. He was on the last ferry of the day from Woods Hole, Massachusetts to Martha's Vineyard. There was a strong wind when the ferry left at 9.45pm and the boat was crowded. McAra parked his car below decks and then went upstairs. No one saw him alive again. The journey to the island usually takes forty-five minutes. That night, because of the bad weather, it was nearly eleven o'clock before the ferry reached Vineyard Haven. When the driver of a new Ford Escape SUV did not come to take it off the boat, some of the crew pushed the car onto the dock and then began a search for the driver. They did not find anyone. A police check showed that the brown Ford Escape belonged to Martin S. Rhinehart of New York City, a well-known publisher. When the police telephoned Mr Rhinehart, he was safe in California. He said that he kept the car at his holiday home on Martha's Vineyard for himself and his guests to use. He told the police that several people were staying there at the moment. After telephoning the house, Rhinehart said that someone was missing – a man called Michael McAra. The next morning, a woman found McAra's body on a beach about six kilometres to the west at Lambert's Cove. The police took it to the little morgue in Vineyard Haven and then drove to Rhinehart's house to give the guests the news and to ask someone to come and identify the body. A person arrived at the morgue in a police car, followed by a second car with four armed guards. It was Adam Lang. Until eighteen months earlier he was the prime minister of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.
